PLANE FACTS

"BOO hoo," cried the little plane.
"Nobody wants me."

His tears fell upon the sawdust in the toy shop window. Around him the other toys paid him no heed. They were used to the little plane. He had been in the window longer than any of them. He was covered with dust, and the dust was constantly being streaked when his tears began to fall.

"Boo h—" he started to weep again, but suddenly he stopped. He saw that the toy shop door had opened. Into the store came a little girl. She had pretty brown pigtails and big eyes the same color. The little plane kept very still, hoping with all his might. "Oh, please please please, little girl, choose me, buy me!"

Next to the plane a voice spoke into his ear . . . or rather, into his silver wing-tip. It was his mortal enemy speaking. The toy ambulance, who was as mean and hateful an ambulance as ever whistled a siren. "What are you whimpering about so anxiously, little plane?" asked the toy ambulance, in his cruellest voice. "You don't mean to tell me you still haven't given up hope! Haw! Haw! Do you actually think anybody'd buy you when I'm here? Ho-ho-ho!"

A lot of the other toys in the window laughed along with the ambulance. One toy, however, blinked his head-light at the little plane sympathetically. This toy was the motorcycle, a tiny one with a make-believe policeman sitting on top of it. The little motorcycle never said anything out loud to the little plane, but nevertheless the little plane could tell what he was thinking. The little plane knew that the motorcycle was his friend. He knew this just as well as he knew that the ambulance was his enemy.

After the ambulance had stopped teasing him, the little plane looked anxiously at the customer.. The little girl with the brown eyes and the brown pigtails was staring carefully into the window now. She fingered some of the toys. The plane hoped all the harder. Then the little girl pointed. "That's the toy I want," she announced . . . and her voice didn't sound half as sweet as she looked.

"There!" It was the little plane's friend she'd chosen. "Yes, I'll buy the motorcycle," she said.

The little plane thought his heart would break. Again he had not been chosen. He must stay on forever, it seemed, in this dusty window. But the worst part of it now was that he must stay on alone without his friend, the motorcycle. There would be no one now to defend him from the cruel remarks of the ambulance.

Just as the motorcycle was being wrapped up, the little girl began to screech and holler in an awful way. "I changed my mind, I don't want any old crumby motorcycle!" She stamped her foot and had such a terrible tantrum, the little plane thought, "How lucky I am not to have been chosen by her! Golly, I bet she treats all her toys so mean!"

The little plane glowed all over as his motorcycle pal was put back in the window. The little girl had chosen something else. She had chosen the ambulance. Away went the ambulance under the unpleasant girl's arm. The little plane smiled. And the motorcycle blinked his headlight as if to say, "There they go! They deserve each other . . . two of a kind! Good riddance!"

It was several days later that the little plane and the motorcycle were moping in the hot window when the shop door opened and a boy came in. He was smiling a wonderful smile, exactly the kind of smile the little plane had always wanted to belong to. The boy asked the shop-owner for a small silver plane with an open cockpit . . . a plane, he added, which didn't cost too much.

The little plane's wings quivered with anticipation. "Why, I'm just what he wants," he thought joyously. But suddenly he heard the shop-owner saying that the only plane he had that was anything like what the boy wanted was a yellow one which cost quite a bit. And the little plane realized with horror that the owner had forgotten about him! The little plane had been there so long and was covered with so much dust that he was not even remembered. Then he heard the little boy say sadly, "Well, okay, if I can't get what I want I might as well take this yellow one."

A tear ran down the little plane's fuselage, and the motorcycle blinked his light sympathetically. But . . . all of a sudden . . . the yellow plane was put back in the window and the lonely little silver plane felt a hand lift him gently, lovingly out of the window. The boy brushed the dust off him and smiled a most wonderful smile. "Why, here's just the plane I want!" he said.

The shop-owner apologized, explaining that he'd forgotten all about that particular little plane and the boy could have it for practically nothing. The boy didn't listen too hard. He was busy smiling happily at the little plane and noticing that the little plane seemed to be smiling back at him! And do you know what he bought with the change? Yes! the tiny motorcycle with the headlight that blinked and blinked!
